Creating An Emotional Connection During Training

One of the first skills is to read dogs and predict what they are about to do. Reading each dog that you work with means developing an emotional connection with them ---to the point where you can talk to and understand what the dog is telling you through your own gut.

Getting "the eye of the dog" is listening to the dog not just with your eyes but also with your heart. Dog training is a very emotional experience. It requires a holistic approach including a physical, mental and spiritual connection with the dog. It's an attitude from within. Hesitation equals fear. A dog expects and respects a confident leader.

A dog reacts to your body language extremely fast. To teach him well, you must be able to anticipate his movements and quickly respond with the appropriate technique, with passion, intensity, enthusiasm and sensitivity.

That is the right approach.

A dog must clearly understand in defined terms that when he does something right he is rewarded and that when he starts to do something wrong there is a consequence. Your ability to time the praise --as well as the consequence --is critical to getting the dog to understand. Timing is everything in dog training.

Canines could not care less if you are cool. Dog's respond better to someone who displays a large range of body --language communication skills. And believe it or not: Onlookers, whom you feel are embarrassed by your behavior, will actually respect you for showing such sensitivity toward the dog and being in tune with the dog.
